Formation of Ethnic Minority Organizations in the First Years of Ukrainian Independence

Abstract

Ukraine’s progress in European integration requires understanding the specifics of ethnic policy under current conditions. Therefore, the issue of historical retrospectives of the formation and activities of ethnic minority organizations in the early 1990s as one of the factors of state-building remains relevant. This study aims to analyze the historical context and peculiarities of the institutionalization of ethnic minority structures in Ukraine at the initial stage of the restoration of Ukrainian state independence. The research object is ethnic minority organizations, primarily those that focused their activities on national and cultural revival. The methodological framework includes the principles of historicism, tolerance, scientific impartiality, and impartiality. We have traced the specifics of the formation of ethnic community organizations and the main vectors of their activities during the specified period. Despite many common historical, cultural, and socio-political backgrounds, the formation of such organizations for different communities could have its peculiarities. For example, for Jewish organizations, the demographic issue was acute due to emigrant sentiments in the Jewish community. As for ethnic minorities like Hungarians and Romanians, they had close ties with their historical homelands. This fact also influenced their organizational structure in Ukraine. The Georgian minority built their organizations emphasizing cooperation between Ukraine and Georgia. Germans also sought to maintain ties with their historical homeland. For Poles, the religious factor was significant. Overall, in Ukraine, there were quite favorable conditions for the full development and activities of ethnic minorities despite the complex political and economic situation of the early 1990s. Nowadays, the issue of organizational development of ethnic communities is a matter of focus for state authorities both at the legislative level and at the level of local communities.

INTRODUCTION

Since December 13, 2022, the Law "On National Minorities (Communities) of Ukraine" has been in force in Ukraine. The previous legislative act was the Law "On National Minorities in Ukraine" of June 1992. The current realities require a look back at the history of the formation of ethnic minority organizations in the early 1990s to retrospectively analyze the rather long and challenging path covered by Ukraine in the field of ethnic policy. It is necessary to develop fundamentally new approaches and principles for the development of ethnic minorities in the XXI century. The emphasis should be on preserving historical and cultural heritage, cultural diversity, and harmonious coexistence with representatives of different ethnic groups and cultural and religious traditions.

The processes of organizing ethnic communities are also crucial in terms of the following aspects of social and political life. Such structures often act as intermediaries between ethnic communities and state authorities, promote cultural diplomacy, international relations, etc. At the same time, they also address individual requests for spiritual development, communication, and interaction with people of their ethnicity and traditions.

LITERATURE REVIEW

Based on the chronological framework of our study, it is reasonable to refer to the scientific developments of the 1990s and early 2000s. These studies were written directly upon fresh impressions of both the process of restoring Ukrainian state independence and the specifics of forming and initial activities of various ethnic minority organizations (Research Directorate, Immigration and Refugee Board, Canada, 1999). In particular, important facts are concentrated in the collective publication "Ethnic Directory. Ethnic Minorities in Ukraine" edited by V. Yevtukh (Ethnic Directory. Ethnic Minorities in Ukraine, 1996) and the guide on the national composition of the population of Ukraine compiled by S. Chornyi (Chornyi, 2001).

O. Husiev and Ya analyzed the features of national minorities through the prism of Ukrainian legislation (Kotylko & Husiev, 2023). The peculiarities of optimizing Ukrainian legislation regarding the legal status of national minorities are highlighted in the article by O. Perederii (Perederii, 2022). M. Zerkal studied the significance of national and cultural societies, media, and non-governmental organizations in educating ethnic minorities (Zerkal, 2013). L. Kovach analyzed the activities of national-cultural societies (Kovach, 2008). The researcher examined Ukrainian and foreign scientific achievements regarding the influence of socio-economic factors on ethnopolitical processes (Kovach, 2021). The activities of ethnic minority community organizations became the subject of scientific attention for L. Loiko (Loiko, 2007). A. Shaikhudinov studied the political-legal aspects of the functioning of ethnic minorities in Ukraine from the 1990s to the early 2000s (Shaikhudinov, 2009). The problems of ethnic self-identification in Ukraine from 1989 to 2001 were studied by I. Stebelsky (Stebelsky, 2009).

For the further development of our research, it is vital to engage the contributions of scholars who study the experience of institutionalization and social and political activity of ethnic minorities in different countries. In particular, a comparative analysis of the Hungarian minorities in Romania, Slovakia, Serbia, and Ukraine was carried out by V. Kotyhereko (Kotyhereko, Kalakura, Kovach, Kotsur, Kochan, Liashenko, Nikolaets, Novorodovsky, & Panchuk, 2020). The development of state ethnopolicy requires attention not only to local specifics but also to the experience of other countries and the possibilities of implementing positive results in their own countries. Such experience is the subject of a monograph on the Visegrad Group countries (State policy on the protection of the rights of national minorities: the experience of the Visegrad Group countries. Collective monograph, 2019). The needs and priorities of the state ethnic policy and the dynamics of its development require a scientific understanding of previous developments in this area. These issues are discussed in the collective research paper led by V. Kotyhereko (Kotyhereko, Kalakura, Kovach, Kotsur, Kochan, Liashenko, Nikolaets, Novorodovsky, & Panchuk, 2020). The problems of formation and practical application of basic value principles of ethno-political development of the state are the subject of the study by O. Rafalskyi (discourse of ethno-politics, language issue, national memory) (Rafalskyi, 2018). A. Harbaruk focused on the corpus of Polonist studies devoted to the 1990s (Harbaruk, 2021). The institutionalization of the Polish movement in Ukraine in the late 1980s and early 1990s is the subject of an article by S. Rudnicki (Rudnicki, 2013).

The transformation of the perception of ethnic minority identity in Poland, based on the example of several generations of Ukrainians and Belarusians, was examined by I. Matysiak (2014). A. Haase studied the coexistence of minorities and ethnic majorities. The researcher was particularly concerned about the expansion of European integration borders and the problem of minorities' incorporation into a new geopolitical environment (Haase, 2005). European identification as a reaction to the socio-economic and cultural achievements of European integration among eight ethnic minorities from the Danube to the Baltic was studied by N. Chistiakova and N. Waechter (2016). Based on empirical data on 12 ethnic minorities in Central and Eastern Europe, V. Cebotari proves that the choice of identity is influenced by the level of socialization, economic status, possible discrimination, and intergroup tension (Cebotari, 2016). S. Shulman studied civic and ethnic national identification in Ukraine (Shulman, 2004). L. Barrington (Barrington, 2022) also directs his research interests in the same direction. The impact of crisis phenomena on identity in the case of Ukraine is the subject of a study by O. Onuch, G.E. Hale, and G. Sasse (2018). O. Onuch and G.E. Hale studied the relationship between individual language preferences, language affiliation, and ethnolinguistic identity (Onuch & Hale, 2018). A non-standard view of the problems of ethnic minorities in Ukraine in the first years of the restoration of state independence is offered by D. Burds. The research is based on the testimonies of emigrants from Ukraine in the 1990s who left the country and claimed refuge in the United States, Canada, Australia, the United Kingdom, and the European Union. The author insists that during these years, harassment of religious and ethnic minorities was widespread in Ukraine (Burds, 2008).

Migration processes in Ukraine have intensified research on interethnic and intercultural relations between Ukrainians and their neighboring peoples. The study covers a wide range of topics, from the politics of memory and commemorations of controversial issues of history to everyday communication and social communications (Ilkovych, 2021; Lytvyn & Khakhula, 2019; Novorodovskiy, 2020; Osikowicz, 2023). The problems of Jewish revival through the organization of Jewish communities have been addressed by V. Yelenskiy and S. Kalyan (Yelenskiy, 2020; Kalyan, 2006). The monograph by V. Kotsur (Kotsur, 2019) is a significant contribution to the comprehensive study of socio-political transformations, foreign policy challenges, and political imbalances that directly affected Ukraine's national minorities during the 1990s and early XXI century.

Aims

This study aims to examine the specifics of the formation of ethnic minority organizations in Ukraine in the early 1990s. It is essential to clarify the historical context that influenced the processes of institutionalization of ethnic communities at the initial stage of the restoration of Ukraine's state independence.

In the context of the Russian-Ukrainian war and geopolitical global transformations, which, among other things, affect national and cultural identity, understanding the forms and methods of organization and activity of ethnic communities is an essential factor for the consolidation of the Ukrainian political nation.

METHODS

Understanding the processes of national and cultural revival of Ukraine's ethnic communities requires interdisciplinary approaches and methods of study. These processes began at the end of the Soviet Union and are still ongoing, having reached a qualitatively new stage of awareness of the importance of both the formation of the Ukrainian political nation and the preservation of their own identity. The general scientific methods of analysis, synthesis, comparison, and generalization should be applied. This allowed us to take a holistic view of the problem and form conclusions and priorities for further research. We used bibliographic analysis and source analysis based on the principles of historicism. These methods allowed us to form a database of information and knowledge that is directly or indirectly related to the subject of the study. The bibliographic method contributed to the systematization of scientific developments associated with the study of institutionalization processes among ethnic minorities in Ukraine in the early 1990s. Source analysis is necessary to summarize the research results and study the evidence. The information approach made it possible to trace the development and transformation of trends in the scientific discourse covering the issues of our study. It was essential to analyze the research of foreign scholars related to the study of ethnic minorities, identity, relations between minorities and representatives of the ethnic majority, and state ethnic policy in different countries. Such approaches allowed us to analyze the discourse of the problem more thoroughly and to confirm or refute the claims of scholars about the specifics of the formation of ethnic minority organizations in Ukraine during the period in question. The historical-comparative and historical-typological methods were tested. These methods helped to understand the historical context, reasons, and preconditions for the formation of ethnic minority organizations and the specifics of their activities at the initial stage of the restoration of Ukrainian state independence. The cultural method was employed to understand the interrelation of political processes as well as national and cultural revival.

RESULTS

In our research, we relied on data from the 1989 population census. This data is scattered across statistical compilations, government websites, and academic publications. Due to the collapse of the USSR, a full description of the census data was never published. In Ukraine, the population census was done in 2001, so its results do not cover the timeframe of our study.
According to the 1989 census, 51,452,034 people lived in the Ukrainian SSR. Ukrainians (the title nation) made up 72.7% of all residents. The largest national minorities were Russians (22.1%) and Belarusians (0.9%) (Population Census Results). The results of the 1989 census showed both the negative impact of the Russification policy on ethnic groups and the cessation of this process. For example, by the end of the 1980s, there was not a single school with Ukrainian as the school language in Donetsk, Luhansk, Chernihiv, Mykolaiv, Kharkiv, and Odesa. Moreover, according to the census, 130 ethnic groups lived in Ukraine. The majority of them included 17 ethnic groups, including Ukrainians, Russians, Jews, Belarusians, Moldovans, Romanians, Greeks, Poles, Crimean Tatars, Bulgarians, and Gagauzes (Kotyhorenko, Kalakura, Kovach, Kotsur, Kochan, Liashenko, Nikolaiets, Novorodovskyi, & Panchuk, 2020: 425-426).

We have systematized the data on the most organizationally active ethnic minorities and their structures in a table (Ethnic Directory. Ethnic minorities in Ukraine. Part II, 1996: 24-25, 29-30, 37-38, 54, 83, 93, 101.102, 114-115, 138-142; Population Census Results; Chornyi, 2001).

DISCUSSIONS

The basic characteristics of ethnic minorities include common origin, language, religious beliefs, cultural and values orientations, and interaction based on these characteristics (A guide to race and ethnicity terminology and language, 2023). In international legal norms, there is no clear distinction between "ethnic minority" and "national minority." From the context, it follows that these concepts are related, except that certain political characteristics are added to the characteristics of a national minority (such as participation in the political life of the country of residence and citizenship they hold) (Ethnocratological Dictionary, 2007: 149, 391).

Even today, as V. Troskhnyskiy proves, Ukraine has not fully formed a model of state ethno-politics that would allow ethnic minorities to be maximally included in the country's social life (Troskhnyskiy, 2018). In general, the following characteristics of the ethnopolitical situation have crystallized in Ukraine before the revival of state independence:

- On the one hand, national consciousness emerged among various ethnic groups, both Ukrainians and national minorities. On the other hand, resistance to this by the authorities, despite the processes of democratization of socio-political life.

- The titular ethnic group's desire to form its own statehood and the willingness of various ethnic groups under the influence of this tendency to express their own identity.

- Inconsistency in the policy of national relations and certain chaos in the forms and manifestations of national-cultural self-assertion.

- Regional specificity of ethnonational processes.

- The authorities lack effective and real experience in the field of national policy-making. This often leads to declarative measures instead of practical steps, especially legislative ones (Kotyhorenko, Kalakura, Kovach, Kotsur, Kochan, Liashenko, Nikolaiets, Novorodovskyy, & Panchuk, 2020: 427-428).

There were attempts at anti-state activity by certain organizations of ethnic minorities. Thus, with the support of certain political forces in Romania, the Society of Romanian Culture named after M. Eminescu and the Christian-Democratic Alliance of Romanians in Ukraine sought to escalate the situation by inflating issues of the state's territorial integrity, as well as problems related to education, legal protection of Romanian rights in Ukraine, which were allegedly disregarded. This was reported in the local press, and calls were made to the international community. For such activities, the leaders of these organizations received warnings from the Ministry of Justice of Ukraine (Kotsur, 2019: 150). Overall, such actions introduced a specific imbalance into the life of the Chernivtsi region. We can cite an example from today as a counterbalance to such destructive activity. This concerns the project "National Communities and Native Peoples," created by the organization "Ukrainer" and the Ukrainian Institute (Romanians of Ukraine. Who are they? 2020).

Organizations of ethnic minorities in the territories of Ukraine existed long before the first years of the restoration of state independence in 1991. However, there is no institutional or generational connection between the organizations that existed, let us say, in the conditions of empires or the Soviet period of Ukrainian history. Organizations of ethnic minorities that exist today or have operated since 1991 emerged either in the years of Soviet "restructuring" or in the first years of the restoration of state independence (Loiko, 2007: 256). Identification and presentation of oneself in the socio-humanitarian space, in society, in political and economic processes, the desire to defend one's rights and interests within the state by ethnic minorities is determined by several aspects:

- Public identification of one's affiliation with an ethnic community other than the dominant one in the state.

- Demands at the state level for recognition of one's distinctiveness within the ethnocultural diversity of the state.
Based on this, cultural, political, or other rights within the existing legislation are defended, or relevant legislative decisions are lobbied for.

Such defending of personal ethnic interests can range from demands to receive education in the mother language and to organize cultural associations to territorial or political autonomy or even secessionist calls and actions (Hryniuk & Kosheliuk, 2007: 361-362).

On the website of the Encyclopedia "Britannica," a circular diagram of the ethnic composition of the population of Ukraine is presented based on the 2001 census data. The ethnic minorities indicated on the chart include Russians, Belarusians, Moldovans, and Crimean Tatars. 3.3% of the population is listed as "other" (Makuch, Stebelsky, & Kryzhanivsky, 2024). The issue of the status of the Crimean Tatar people was raised during debates on February 12, 1991, in the Verkhovna Rada of the Ukrainian SSR. However, at that time, for various reasons, obtaining the status of native people proved to be problematic. The question of the status of the Karaites and Krymchaks as indigenous peoples also required legal clarification (Belitser, 2016). The Law of Ukraine, "On Native Peoples of Ukraine," was adopted only on July 1, 2021. According to the provisions of the Law, the Crimean Tatars, Karaites, and Krymchaks have the status of native people of Ukraine (Law of Ukraine "On Native Peoples of Ukraine").

On June 25, 1992, the Law of Ukraine "On National Minorities in Ukraine" was adopted. The articles of the Law guarantee citizens of Ukraine, regardless of their national origin, equal civil rights and freedoms. Article 3 of the Law defines the term "national minorities." Also, at the legislative level, the right of national minorities to education in their native language was guaranteed, both in state educational institutions and through the activities of national cultural societies and cultural development (Law of Ukraine "On National Minorities in Ukraine"). This was a framework law, and it remained in force until July 1, 2023.

Even during the years of Soviet "perestroika," the leadership of the USSR sought to continue to control processes related to national movements in various union republics. For example, on April 18, 1988, the Commission of the Verkhovna Rada of the Ukrainian SSR on Patriotic and International Education was established. In 1990, this commission was reformed into the Commission of the Verkhovna Rada of the Ukrainian SSR on State Sovereignty, Inter-Republican, and Interethnic Relations. During March-July 1990, the Law "On the Establishment of the State Committee of the USSR on Nationalities Issues" was adopted. On July 9, 1991, the Committee on Nationalities Affairs was established under the Cabinet of Ministers of Ukraine (operated until June 1993). One of the tasks of this committee was to create conditions for meeting the socio-cultural needs, revival, and development of the cultures and languages of national groups living in the territory of the republic, as well as promotion of the activities of their public formations (Decree of July 9, 1991 No. 7 On the formation of the Committee on Nationalities under the Cabinet of Ministers of the Ukrainian SSR). As of the beginning of 1991, there were 87 national-cultural societies in the Ukrainian SSR. They began to organize in the spring of 1989. These were public associations formed for the practical realization of the linguistic, cultural, religious, informational, and communication needs of ethnic minorities in the country. Among these 87 national-cultural societies were 22 Jewish, 8 Russian and Polish, 6 Bulgarian, 5 Armenian, 4 Greek, 3 German, 2 Karaim, and Moldovan (Yakubova, 2010). Initially, the societies operated within the framework of friendship and cultural relations societies with foreign countries (in the Soviet format of such structures). For example, a Greek community was established in Mariupol in January 1989. It was registered as a Greek language club under the Taras Shevchenko Native Language Society at the Donetsk regional branch of the Ukrainian Cultural Fund.

Similarly, in June 1989, a Jewish cultural and educational center, "Aleph," was organized in Donetsk (Kovach, 2018: 35). However, this situation could not last long, considering the centrifugal processes within the country and the growth of national movements and aspirations for ethnic and cultural self-identification. Societies led by non-conformists, human rights activists, and nationally oriented intelligentsia began to consolidate. Such societies operated in various cities of Ukraine. At the same time, there was a process of official organizational development: development of statutes, program principles of activity, personnel development, and official registration with government authorities. The cultural and educational society of Poles in Ukraine was established based on the "Society of Soviet-Polish Friendship." During 1990-1991, the "Union of Poles of Ukraine" and the "Federation of Polish Societies of Ukraine" were organized (Pekarchuk, 2014: 106-107). By the end of 1991, there were 150 national-cultural societies in Ukraine; by 1995, there were 237 (16 with all-Ukrainian status). They represented the interests of 38 ethnic groups. In 1989, the Council of National-Cultural Societies of Ukraine was established. Since February 1993, this structure has received the status of a representative body of national societies as an advisory body to the Ministry of Nationalities and Migration (Kovach, 2008: 99).

The forms of national and cultural organizations that operated in Ukraine during this period involved various forms: regional national and cultural communities, religious communities and associations, women's organizations, charitable foundations, Sunday schools, sports, youth, student associations, and hobby groups. In other words, ethnic revival occurred within the framework of national and cultural organizations. Their activities covered more than just ethnic and national manifestations, uniting people not only on ethnic principles but also on cultural needs and demographic, social, and gender factors. At the initial stage of their activities, ethnic minority organizations focused on learning their native language. Also, since 1991, such organizations have been able to officially register their activities and direct their efforts to national and cultural revival. This included learning the language and exploring its history, reviving traditions and customs, searching for and preserving cultural heritage and historical memory, etc. The first half of the 1990s witnessed a rapid growth of national cultural organizations. By the fall of 1990, there were 84 of them in Ukraine, and by the end of 1994-237. In particular, these included 16 All-Ukrainian national-cultural societies, including Assyrian, German, Greek, several Polish, Georgian, Russian, Jewish, Romanian, Korean, Meskhetian, Hungarian, and Czech societies. People joined these societies on a voluntary basis. They wanted to have a real impact on the processes of the national and cultural revival of their ethnic community and integrate into the society of the new Ukraine. They shared common values and had a certain material base for realizing their goals and missions. However, there was an acute lack of premises. These societies were autonomous in their activities and promoted communication and integration of their ethnic group within their cultural traditions. They were engaged in creative, educational, and upbringing work. However, the activities of such organizations should not be viewed exclusively through folklore and ethnography. Their functions were much broader. This is evidenced, in particular, by the creation of the Council of National Societies of Ukraine and the Main Editorial Office of Literature in the Languages of National Minorities (Khriashevska, 2016: 17). As for the Jewish community of Ukraine, since the second half of the 1980s, the process of Jewish emigration to their historical homeland has intensified. Therefore, the formation and development of Jewish national and cultural societies took place in two directions:

1) the traditional activities of such associations;
2) the focus on preparing for emigration (Kalian, 2006: 417).

CONCLUSIONS

The process of forming ethnic minority organizations in Ukraine began in the late 1980s. However, at that time, such organizations were based on existing Soviet-style societies and controlled by Soviet authorities. Soon, in contrast, ethnic minority structures began to be organized, initiated, and led by representatives of the national intelligentsia, dissidents, and human rights activists. Initially, the sphere of ethnic minority organizations' activities included cultural and educational initiatives. The assimilatory Soviet policy contributed to losing national identity, forming a "Soviet person." The policy of Russification also hurt the national and cultural identity of ethnic minorities. The issue of learning their native language and preserving and reviving national traditions, culture, and religion was particularly relevant. There were also attempts to politicize the activities, which can be seen as a negative trend in the context of state-building in Ukraine in the early 1990s.

During the first years of regaining its independence, Ukraine had to resolve issues related to the formation of its own model of ethnic policy based on the principles of democratic development, cultural diversity, and ethnic and religious tolerance, taking into account both state interests and the interests of all ethnic groups living in the country. At the legislative level, this process continues to this day. This is evidenced by the Law of Ukraine "On National Minorities (Communities) of Ukraine" of 2022 and other national and international legislative acts.
Realizing the fundamentally new realities was challenging in the early 1990s. According to them, Ukraine had to define the titular nation and ethnic minorities and overcome the Soviet colonial legacy at all levels of socio-political activity and in the socio-humanitarian space. This was especially relevant for the total Russification of almost all ethnic groups living in Ukraine.

The formation of ethnic community organizations took place under similar circumstances but in different starting conditions. There are ethnic communities that cooperated closely in their organizational institutionalization and could receive various types of assistance from their country of origin (Jews, Germans, and Poles). The ethno-political activity of the communities also varied due to the specifics of the historical and political development of a particular ethnic minority, as well as by demographic, educational, and urbanization differences.

Further research should focus on the ethno-confessional communities of Ukraine and their role in the national and cultural revival process, as well as the activities of ethnic minorities in Ukraine.
